Introduction:

I am quite an extrovert who loves to explore and socialize. Moreover, I have been to numerous places thus far. Recently, I visited a place thronged by people who had gathered during a fest. It was literally an overwhelming experience. It looked as if 300 crickets were chirping together in a small container. On top of that, each one of those 300 was trying to out-speak the entire crowd.

When did this happen?

The event took place in the moderate month of September/October. Referring to the Hindu Calendar, they are named as the month of Kartik.

Where was it?

The fest I'm talking about is the festival that happens in the city of Bundi, which is significantly known as the Bundi Utsav. It is located in the Hatodi region of Rajasthan, popularly considered the "Land of Kings."

Why there was a lot of noise?

It is actually an annual fest representing the city's rich cultural heritage and traditional art forms, as well as its historical significance.

And explain what you did when you heard the noise.

As I have mentioned, I love to interact with new people. However, in this particular event, I found it hard to cope with the endless clattering. So, I decided to escape from that place as soon as I could. Generally, when a noise overpowers my auditory senses, I squint my eyes first. Consequently, my hands automatically reached my ears, and my feet tried to run out of the place and away from the crowd. Adding to the pain, the people's physical presence made it tougher for me to reach the exit. Thus, I let my elbows, sticking out in front of my body, paving the way for me.
